Delivery Partner Related Queries

Rider Behaviour

Delivery partners are expected to conduct themselves with professionalism, courtesy, and respect during every interaction. Customers have the right to receive their orders in a timely manner without experiencing rude, dismissive, or inappropriate behaviour from the person delivering their items.

Common situations involving rider behaviour include abrupt communication, refusal to follow delivery instructions, or visible frustration when asked reasonable questions about an order. In some cases, a rider may express impatience if a customer takes time to answer the door or verify the contents of a delivery. While delivery partners work under time constraints, this does not excuse unprofessional interactions with customers.

If you experience behaviour that makes you uncomfortable, you are encouraged to document what occurred, including the time of delivery, specific comments made, and any actions that felt inappropriate. This documentation supports accurate reporting and helps ensure that investigations are thorough and fair.

Resolution pathways typically involve submitting a detailed report through the available customer support channels. Support teams review the specifics of the incident, which may include checking delivery logs, communication records, and any prior history of similar reports. Outcomes can range from coaching and additional training for the rider to more serious corrective measures, depending on the severity and frequency of the behaviour.

Your safety and comfort during every delivery experience are priorities. You should never feel obligated to tolerate behaviour that violates basic standards of respect and professionalism.

Rider Safety

The safety of delivery partners is a shared responsibility between the service, the customer, and the rider themselves. Riders operate in varied conditions, including heavy traffic, adverse weather, and unfamiliar neighbourhoods, all of which can create genuine risks to their physical wellbeing.

Customers play an important role in rider safety by ensuring that delivery locations are accessible, well-lit, and free from hazards. Providing accurate address details, gate codes, and clear directions reduces the time riders spend searching for locations, which in turn minimises exposure to potential accidents or unsafe situations.

If a delivery is delayed due to safety concerns—such as a rider encountering severe weather, road closures, or a vehicle issue—customers are asked to exercise patience and understanding. Support teams monitor such situations and can provide updates on delivery status when available.

In situations where a rider appears injured, distressed, or involved in an accident upon arrival, customers should prioritise the rider's immediate safety. Do not pressure an injured rider to complete the delivery. Instead, contact emergency services if needed and report the incident to customer support so that appropriate assistance can be arranged.

Rider safety also extends to respectful treatment during interactions. Verbal abuse, threats, or aggressive behaviour from customers toward riders are taken seriously and can result in account restrictions or permanent suspension.

Rider Asked Extra Money

A delivery partner requesting additional payment beyond the amount confirmed at checkout is a serious concern that violates standard service agreements. All delivery fees, service charges, and applicable taxes are calculated and displayed before an order is placed, and no further payment should be required from the customer at the point of delivery.

Common situations include a rider claiming that the delivery distance was longer than expected, that tolls or parking fees were incurred, or that the original fee was insufficient to cover their effort. In some cases, riders may suggest that cash tips are mandatory rather than voluntary. Regardless of the reason presented, customers are not obligated to pay extra, and doing so is entirely at their discretion.

If a rider insists on additional payment and refuses to hand over the order, remain calm and do not engage in confrontation. Politely decline the request, note the details of the interaction, and contact customer support immediately. If you feel unsafe, prioritise your personal security and report the incident as soon as you are in a safe location.

Support teams investigate such reports by reviewing delivery records, route data, and any communication between the rider and customer. If the request for extra money is confirmed, the rider may face penalties ranging from formal warnings to permanent removal from the platform. Customers who were pressured into paying may be eligible for reimbursement of the unauthorised amount.

Rider Harassment

Harassment by a delivery partner is unacceptable under any circumstances and is treated with the utmost seriousness. Harassment can take many forms, including unwanted comments about your appearance, persistent contact after a delivery is complete, inappropriate questions about your personal life, or any behaviour that creates an intimidating, hostile, or offensive environment.

Examples of harassment situations include a rider making repeated phone calls after delivery under the pretence of confirming details, sending unsolicited messages through chat or personal contact channels, or making physical gestures or comments of a sexual or discriminatory nature. Even if a rider claims the contact is innocent or work-related, any communication that makes you feel unsafe or uncomfortable constitutes grounds for reporting.

If you experience harassment, your immediate safety is the priority. Do not feel compelled to continue the interaction. If the rider is still at your location, you may politely end the conversation and secure your premises. Document everything you can remember, including the rider's description, the time, what was said or done, and whether there were any witnesses.

Report the incident to customer support as soon as possible. Investigations into harassment allegations are handled with strict confidentiality and urgency. Depending on the findings, outcomes can include immediate suspension of the rider pending investigation, permanent deactivation, and, in severe cases, referral to law enforcement authorities. Support teams may also provide guidance on additional steps you can take to protect yourself, including blocking future assignment of that rider to your orders.

Unprofessional Conduct

Unprofessional conduct encompasses a broad range of behaviours that fall below the expected standard of service delivery. This includes arriving in an unkempt or unclean state, handling food or packages without care, using offensive language, or engaging in personal activities—such as smoking or taking phone calls—while completing your delivery.

Specific examples include a rider opening food packaging to inspect contents without permission, delivering items that have clearly been damaged due to careless handling, or making discriminatory remarks. Unprofessional conduct also covers breaches of privacy, such as commenting on the contents of your order or taking photographs of your property without a valid delivery-related reason.

When unprofessional conduct occurs, customers are encouraged to provide detailed feedback at the earliest opportunity. Specificity helps support teams understand the nature of the concern and determine the appropriate response. For instance, noting that a package was left in a puddle rather than a covered area, or that a rider used offensive language when asked about a delay, provides actionable information.

Investigation processes typically involve reviewing the delivery details, any photographic evidence submitted by the rider, and the customer's account of events. Resolution pathways may include retraining, formal warnings, or removal of the rider from the service. In cases involving damaged goods, customers may be offered replacements, refunds, or account credits depending on the circumstances and the terms of service.

Contact Rider

Communication with a delivery partner should be limited to matters directly related to the active delivery. Customers and riders may need to exchange brief messages or calls to clarify address details, gate access codes, or specific drop-off instructions. This communication is intended to facilitate smooth and accurate delivery.

For your safety and privacy, personal contact information is typically masked or routed through secure communication channels. You should not attempt to obtain a rider's personal phone number, social media details, or other private information, nor should you share your own personal contact details outside the provided channels.

If a rider contacts you after a delivery has been completed, particularly for non-delivery-related reasons, this is a breach of professional boundaries. Examples include a rider messaging to ask you out, to sell you services, or to discuss matters unrelated to the completed order. Such contact should be reported to customer support.

In situations where you need to contact a rider—such as providing a corrected address or notifying them of a change in delivery instructions—use only the official communication tools available within the service. Avoid discussing personal matters, making arrangements outside the platform, or engaging in extended conversations that are not necessary for the completion of the delivery.

Rider Rating

Rating systems allow customers to provide feedback on their delivery experience, which helps maintain service quality and identify riders who consistently meet or exceed expectations. Ratings are typically submitted after a delivery is completed and may include both a numerical score and optional written comments.

When providing a rating, customers are encouraged to be honest and specific. A high rating generally reflects timely delivery, professional behaviour, careful handling of items, and clear communication. A lower rating may be appropriate when a rider was significantly late without explanation, displayed unprofessional behaviour, or failed to follow delivery instructions.

It is important to rate based on the delivery experience itself rather than factors outside the rider's control. For example, delays caused by restaurant preparation times, traffic conditions, or severe weather are typically not the rider's responsibility. Similarly, if an item was missing from your order, the issue usually lies with the merchant rather than the delivery partner.

Ratings directly influence rider performance metrics and can affect their eligibility for incentives, priority assignments, or continued participation on the platform. Constructive feedback, whether positive or negative, helps the service recognise excellence and address areas where improvement is needed.

If you submit a rating and later realise it was given in error, or if new information comes to light that changes your perspective, contact customer support to request a review of the feedback.

Delivery Dispute

A delivery dispute arises when there is a disagreement between the customer and the delivery partner regarding the completion or condition of an order. Common disputes include allegations that an order was not delivered, that items are missing or incorrect, or that the delivery was made to the wrong address.

When a dispute occurs, the investigation process examines multiple sources of information to determine what happened. This may include delivery photographs, GPS tracking data, timestamps, communication logs, and the rider's account of the delivery. In cases of missing items, the investigation may also involve the merchant to verify what was prepared and handed to the rider.

If you believe your order was not delivered, check your surroundings thoroughly, including alternative entrances, building lobbies, and designated safe drop-off areas. Sometimes deliveries are left in locations that may not be immediately obvious. If you still cannot locate your order, report the issue promptly with as much detail as possible.

For disputes involving damaged or incorrect items, photographic evidence of the condition in which the order was received is highly valuable. Support teams aim to resolve disputes fairly, and outcomes may include full or partial refunds, re-delivery of the order, or account credits. In cases where investigation findings indicate rider error, appropriate corrective action is taken.

Safety Escalation

Safety escalation procedures exist to address situations where a customer feels threatened, unsafe, or involved in an incident that requires immediate and serious attention. These situations go beyond routine complaints and involve genuine risks to personal security or wellbeing.

Examples requiring safety escalation include a rider exhibiting aggressive or threatening behaviour, refusing to leave your property, appearing to be under the influence of substances, or engaging in physical contact without consent. If you ever feel that your immediate safety is at risk, contact local emergency services first before reporting to customer support.

When reporting a safety escalation, provide as much detail as possible: the rider's description, the time and location of the incident, what specifically occurred, and whether there were witnesses or evidence such as photographs or video. Support teams treat safety escalations with the highest priority and conduct expedited investigations.

Outcomes of safety escalations can include immediate suspension of the rider, permanent removal from the service, and cooperation with law enforcement if criminal behaviour is suspected. Customers involved in safety incidents may also be offered additional support measures, such as blocking the rider from future assignments to their address or providing guidance on protective steps.

Your safety is non-negotiable. Never hesitate to escalate when you feel genuinely at risk.

Emergency Situations

Emergency situations involving delivery partners are rare but require clear, decisive action when they occur. These situations include medical emergencies affecting the rider, accidents during transit or upon arrival, severe weather events that endanger the rider, or security incidents such as theft or assault.

If a rider arrives at your location and appears to be experiencing a medical emergency—such as chest pain, difficulty breathing, or signs of severe injury—call emergency medical services immediately. Do not attempt to provide medical treatment beyond basic first aid if you are trained to do so. Stay with the rider until help arrives if it is safe to do so, and notify customer support so they can coordinate additional assistance.

In the event of an accident involving the rider, whether a vehicle collision or a fall, assess whether emergency services are needed. If the rider is conscious and able to communicate, ask if they require medical attention. Even if injuries appear minor, encourage the rider to seek professional evaluation. Report the incident to customer support with details of what occurred.

During severe weather events, such as floods, storms, or extreme heat, riders may be unable to complete deliveries safely. In such cases, delivery services typically monitor conditions and may suspend operations in affected areas. If you have an active order during such an event, support teams will provide updates on expected delays or cancellations. Do not pressure riders to complete deliveries in dangerous conditions.

If you witness or are informed of a security incident involving a rider, such as theft of their vehicle or delivery bag, report it to local authorities and to customer support. The service can take steps to secure the rider's account and provide necessary resources.

In all emergency situations, the priority is human safety above delivery completion. Your quick thinking and appropriate response can make a significant difference in outcomes.
